Pop down the local ...because small growers using indigenous grapes are making some knockout wines

Every time I listen to Michael Jackson's Thriller I whisper the name Rod Temperton, the Cleethorpes songwriter who wrote this all-time pop classic. Similarly in wine, the expertise of the individuals who bring wines of unforgettable character into Britain should be revered.

Take note of specialist importers like Red Squirrel, The Knotted Vine, Les Caves de Pyrene, Flint, Indigo and their like, who keep bringing out the hits that belong in your collection.

Recently I attended Viñateros, a tasting held by importers and winegrowers focused on Spain. Their passion for wines made from indigenous varieties is underpinned by their belief that great wine is made in the vineyard rather than winemaking technique.

Hard to argue as there were so many knockout wines from characterful pockets of mainland Spain such as Ribeira Sacra and Galicia to the islands of Tenerife and Majorca.

Look out on restaurant lists for producers such as Suertes del Marques, Raventós I Blanc, 4 Kilos, Terroir Al Limit, Envínate and Daniel Landi.

Check out vinaterosldn.com for the full list of producers, many of whom are conjuring wines of remarkable freshness from warm climates.

Doug Wregg of lescaves.co.uk was in jubilant form. His wines are uniquely tantalising – try a bottle of Biu de Sort Blanc Riesling 2014.

Ben Henshaw, head honcho at indigowine.com, says: 'Wine lovers, when they go down this route, find these wines very rewarding both from a drinking point of view and also from getting to know the personalities, regions and grape varieties behind the wines.

'These types of wine, being a little bit fresher, more about balance, higher acidity and drinkability go so well with food that once you start playing around with them at the dinner table or in a restaurant, it's really very difficult to go back to more conventional wine.'

Try his range of Daniel Landi wines and taste for yourself. They may cost a bit more but they'll also give you a taste of wine's answer to Rod Temperton. Here's to a glass of Thriller.
